Dr. Nat Pernick, founder and executive director of Detroit College Promise, will award 100 Detroit Public Schools students college scholarships year, a continuation of its awards program begun in 2009. Detroit College Promise, in partnership with the DPS, public and private sector, civic and community leaders and parents, strives to strengthen the Detroit Public Schools by offering a financial incentive in the form of a scholarship to students who live in Detroit and graduate from a DPS school.

The incentive is a scholarship that can be used at any Michigan public college or university and students can apply as early as kindergarten. The Detroit College Promise fund has been able to provide a $500 college scholarship to hundreds of DPS graduates since it began in early 2009. Last year the average DPS student who received the scholarship also obtained $9,300 in other scholarship money.

“That’s quite a bit,” says Dr. Pernick. “For most of them that paid all of their tuition. We’d like to give more than that. We are moving toward the Kalamazoo Promise model.”

Detroit College Promise began offering its scholarships to graduates of Cody High School in 2009. It expanded to six DPS high schools last year and will cover all 33 regular DPS high schools this year. It has registered 50 percent of the students in DPS high schools and as high as 80 percent in some of the high schools. It’s also moving to begin signing up students in grades K-8 this year.

“The point is to get the students in kindergarten to start thinking about college,” Pernick says.

Detroit College Promise has raised $150,000 for its scholarship goals from 200 donors. It has a goal of $10 million, which would provide every DPS student a four-year college scholarship.
